On Reading Order in Two Columns

Alpha begins the left column with a sentence that runs over several lines and carries the age of information into the next line, where a well-known phrase breaks as well-known across the line end. Left one ends here.

Bravo opens the right column, which a reader reaches only after the whole left column. It keeps going for a few lines so the gutter is plain to see between the two columns of the page and ends the first page right here.

Charlie starts the second page in the left column, again with enough text to fill a few lines and make the columns obvious to anyone who looks closely.

Delta closes the paper in the right column of the second page, after all of the left column has been read and nothing is left to say but goodbye.